

Andrew Kalloch

As the son of public school teachers, a proud Labor Democrat, a father, and a former ACLU attorney, Andrew Kalloch will bring a new generation of leadership to D.C.

At the ACLU, Andrew used the power of the courts, the legislature, and mass protest to fight for justice and equality for all. Andrew spent years in government developing solutions on a range of public policy issues, from climate change and affordable housing, to economic development and criminal justice reform.

Andrew has represented domestic violence survivors in family court, workers fighting big business for unemployment benefits, and incarcerated individuals as they fought for justice behind bars.

Andrew has experienced many of the challenges facing younger Americans, from graduating with six-figure debt and being unable to save for a home until his late 30s, to a $3,000 child care bill that comes due every month.

Andrew is fortunate to be able to pay those bills, but too many Oregonians are falling behind in the 21st century economy. Andrew will deliver a forward-looking vision that gives every community, big and small, a future of better-paying jobs, high-quality education, affordable healthcare, and retirement with dignity.

Andrew was a Board Member of the City Clubs of Eugene and Portland, co-chair of the South Willamette Valley Chapter of the Technology Association of Oregon, and co-chair of the Portland Committee on Community-Engaged Policing.

Andrew and his spouse, Jenna Adams-Kalloch, reside in Eugene, and are the proud parents of three fifth-generation residents of the Southern Willamette Valley.
